Unique ideas and structures

Furnish your essay with content that is unique and shows the reader has worked to come up with them. Most of the ideas don't come up in a single brainstorming session, it comes over during passive phases when you are not actively thinking about a subject. It is thus important to keep a note of ideas that come to you like an epiphany. These ideas can be about the structure of the essay: the way you structure openings or closing of your paragraph, and the way that you link up the parts of your essay according to a theme.

Make everything about you. Be self-centered!

Each word and sentence is precious in the essay. Don't waste the time of the essay readers and your own describing something that doesn't show your growth or has no direct repercussion upon you in the essay. The essay is not measuring your ability to come up with poetic prose and vibrant language, it is about revealing your character in depth through your interaction with ideas, things, and experiences. In order to grant an idea of a place in your essay ask yourself this: Does this idea or experience add to my worth or further explain my character? If no, then you should drop the idea or the experience.

Action Verbs & Distinct Nouns

Let your story rage through its text and palpate out of the screen or the paper. Use an even stronger word and let it jump out of the text and dance for the reader.

Then define your nouns and make them real; let them tug at the readers and stand over the words, so the readers can heed you there and then.

A good play of strong verbs will tell a tale, an almost reverie, that will be grounded by the use of distinct nouns.

Involve Personal Experiences

Personal experiences no matter how embarrassing or painful. These instances that we usually don't talk about or don't want to talk about can be a powerful tool to bring forth our character. These instances of weakness or helplessness connect us with the reader.

While talking about these experiences we give the essay a unique touch and show the admission officers how you have worked through these difficulties and how you are able to confront them now. Maybe out of your comfort, you end up revealing a story that created a spark in the reader for you.

Avoid Being the Over-scrupulous

The process of reviewing should happen throughout the essay process, whether it's the essay or even the unfinished ideas. Don't wait for the essay to be finished according to you, for you might have missed on several opportunities to steer your essay towards something more potent than your current version. Keep consulting your counselor, if you have one, or just let the essay go by a family member or friends, throughout your writing and planning process. A review at the end of the essay will make you much stern about making any changes.

The essay will never be complete to the very end, so there is no point in delaying the review process.
